DRIVER SETS OFF F MEN ALARM

Lad Who Disappeared From Tinley Years Ago Returns With Bride

A story almost as strange as one reads about in the mystery magazines came to light in Tinley Park during the holiday season, but in this instance the story was true and its ending cleared up a deep mystery as well as ending unfounded rumors of foul play.

John Bormet, a well known Tinley Park farmer adopted a son, Albert Bormet about 27 years ago. After living with Mr. Bormet for nine years, the lad suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. All search was fruitless and no clue of any kind was found of the missing boy. After a length of time the gossipers got busy and stories began to make the rounds of the farm communities to the effect that the boy might have met with foul play.

However, the years rolled on and finally the disappearance of the lad was forgotten and the matter was treated as one of those unexplained mysteries of life.

On Christmas Day this year a young man and woman called at the Bormet home, but they were strangers to the Bormets. Finally the man identified himself as the long lost boy and introduced the young lady with him as his life.

The Bormet family was astonished and happily surprised at this revelation. The young man explained his disappearance by saying an older brother had coaxed him to leave the farm and that he went out west.

This Christmas he decided to pay a visit to his old home in Tinley Park. He and his wife spent the Christmas holidays with the Bormet family.

Some people were mystified by Albert's disappearance, but now everything seems to be cleared up.

Robert Sandidge of Tinley Park Dies After Brief Illness

Robert Sandidge, aged 39 years, a resident of Tinley Park for many years, died very suddenly at his home south of Tinley Park last Thursday evening, death it is said being due to poisoning from an infection. He had suffered greatly with a mastoid which is said to have caused the infection. He had been ill for a few days but rapidly grew worse Thursday and was soon beyond medical aid. Mrs. Sandidge who has taught school for many years and who is teaching in the Tinley Park public school had just finished with the school Christmas program and had just returned home when Mr. Sandidge took a turn for the worse and died soon afterward.

Surviving are the wife and a number of relatives. There are no children.

Funeral services were held Saturday afternoon from the Hirsch Funeral Parlor in Tinley Park with the Rev. L. E. Weinreich, pastor of the Tinley Park Methodist church officiating. Burial was made in the Mount Hope cemetery.

Swift & Company Issue Year Book

Swift and Company have just issued their annual year book covering the activities of the year 1939 for this firm.

The yearbook shows that notwithstanding the firm's tonnage sales were slightly more than for 1938, the total dollar sales, exclusive European sales heretofore included, amounted to $756,731,537, a slight decline from last year. This decline is largely a result of the fact that over the course of the year the prices at which the firm sold their products were somewhat lower than the average for the year before.

The net profit for the year came to $10,321,522.65. These earnings represent 4.52 per cent on the shareholders investment and 1.36 cents per dollar of sales.

The 1939 payroll paid to all employees amounted to $99,500,000. Hourly rates are 39 per cent higher and average weekly earnings are 12 per cent higher than they were in 1929. During 1939 over 82 per cent of the hourly paid employees in meat-packing plants enjoyed continuous employment. The outlook for increased receipts of livestock means increased employment.

CITIES ARE WHAT MEN MAKE THEM

"Cities are what men make them. Wherever those cities may be, Whether out on a desolate desert, Or set by the surging sea, Though they cleave to the breasts of mountains,

Or nestle by rivers broad, Cities are what men make them, On land that is given of God.

"Cities are what men make them, What men demand they shall be, Slothful, sloven, sleepy, Progressive, beautiful, free,

If the hearts of the builders are noble,

In one with the day and the need, They build unto grandeur and greatness, For thus it was ever decreed.

"So take up your work as you find it,

Nor grumble at what you have not, Be one of the men to make greater, The place where you have cast your lot.

If the ocean shall threaten to overwhelm you,

Build a dyke that will laugh at its might.

Cities are what men make them, Who are willing to labor and fight."

Mistaken For Cattle Rustler When He Drives In Farm Yard at 1 a. m.

A truck driver who had become confused in his road directions and a group of F men figured in an exciting chase about one o'clock Saturday morning.

The cause of all the commotion was the truck driver who had driven into the farm yard of Highway Commissioner Emil D. Cappel east of Mokena to turn around. The Cappel family heard and saw the truck and were under the impression that cattle rustlers were trying to steal their live stock. An alarm was at once phoned to the members of the F men organization in this section and in an incredibly brief time a large number of F men appeared on the scene showing how well organized this organization is and how quick they can be at the scene of any trouble.

In the meantime the truck driver had left the farm yard headed toward Mokena on the gravel road. The F men followed the truck and caught up with it near the William Roberts farm west of Mokena. The driver was forced off the road and stopped. He was very much surprised and at first thought holdup men were on the job. He soon established his identity as that of a truck driver for Sears Roebuck whose truck he was driving at the time. He had a delivery to make to a farm west of Mokena but he had become confused and understood the place was east of Mokena.

The driver was allowed to proceed on his way after he had satisfied the F men that his identity was correct.

Budget balancing issue likely to hurt both Taft and Roosevelt . . . Worry over congress and voters spurs New Dealers' attacks on Governor Bricker . . . Battle showing of the Admiral Graf Spee bolsters views of U. S. naval experts.

WASHINGTON.—That sparring match between President Roosevelt and Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio over whether government spending can be cut sufficiently to balance the budget is apt to hurt both of them. Shrewd political observers agree that it will hurt the President through its effects on appropriations in the coming session of congress. The same observers figure that the effect on Taft in the spring primaries cannot fail to be hurtful.

The logic as to Taft's losing primary votes is that everyone is against governmental spending—always—except the persons immediately benefited. Hence the logic of the old congressman who never voted against any appropriation or for any tax. So long as Taft raved against spending in general he was on firm ground. But the minute he accepted Roosevelt's challenge and began to go into particulars he could not but hurt himself, if the judgment of observers here is sound.

It is absolutely essential to Taft, to give him a chance for the Republican nomination, that he make an excellent showing in several of the preferential presidential primaries. It is entirely possible for Taft, or Sen. Arthur H. Vandenberg, or Thomas E. Dewey to win pretty nearly a stranglehold on the nomination if any one of them can win, by impressive majorities, all the contests in which the three are engaged.

Republicans Want Winner; Politicians Are Hungry

The Republican politicians are hungry. They have been out in the cold a long time. They want a winner, and they don't care too much whether they agree with all his views or not. Personally, most of the rank and file of the G. O. P. leadership prefers Vandenberg. He is a lovable character, has been around in party circles for a long time, and every one of the state leaders knows that with Vandenberg in the White House that particular leader would have a good friend at court. Taft they rather admire for some of his forthright utterances, and for the willingness to work and do research that the man has shown in the senate. Dewey they distrust, not so much because he is young, but because they dislike the very thought of a crusader, and, besides, they don't know where Dewey stands on issues or on personalities. But these same men are very practical. They will not sacrifice themselves, or their party's chances (the two things are not so different as they sound) for Vandenberg just because of their friendship for and trust in him. He must prove that he is really a vote getter. If Taft or Dewey shows up much stronger by defeating him in a half a dozen primaries, it's curtains for Vandenberg.

New Dealers Are Bitter Against Governor Bricker

The bitter attacks of the New Dealers on Gov. John W. Bricker of Ohio for the relief situation in the Buckeye state are not the result merely of a desire to smear a possible Republican nominee for the presidency. The fact that Bricker is frequently mentioned as a possible dark horse candidate, the fact that "downtown New York" is said to favor him over any of the open candidates—that is over Thomas E. Dewey, Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio and Sen. Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan—lends zest to the attack. But it is not the main motive.

The main motive is the same as was responsible for the tremendous efforts of the Roosevelt administration in its first few years to smear the record of Andrew W. Mellon as secretary of the treasury. During the first few years of the Roosevelt regime, leaving out the first brief period of real economy when the government was slashing veterans' compensation, wages of clerks and everything else, the government was naturally plunging into debt. It disliked the contrast with the nine years of Mellon in the treasury, during which nearly $10,000,000,000 of national debt was paid off.

At the present moment the administration is under fire, particularly from Senator Taft, for the continued spending by Washington of more than it takes in in taxes, and it is growing more and more sensitive about it. It fears that the country is getting concerned, that congress is getting concerned in turn, and that the result may affect not only appropriations by congress in the session to open in January, but the Presidential election.

Governor Bricker's main claim to prominence is that in the third biggest state in the Union—a state which it is vitally essential that a presidential candidate be able to carry—he has balanced the budget.

Governor Who Balances State Budget Arouses Ire

Any statement that a governor has succeeded in balancing a budget always rouses ire in Washington from the national administration if the federal government at the time is not balancing its budget. It invites odious comparisons. It carries the implication, at least, that the governor in question, if he had been president, might have done a better job, at least from the fiscal standpoint, than the President.

So it's no wonder that Bricker's record should start the New Dealers, and especially the ones who want Roosevelt to run for a third term, to yelping. And it's no wonder that Roosevelt himself, regardless of whether he wants to run again or not, should be angry. It simply would be against human nature for things to be different.

So it is not surprising that there were loud cries, and it is not surprising that the Republican national committee, seeing how much pain was being experienced in the inner circle, should go to bat. It so happens that Fulton Lewis Jr., a radio commentator, went out to Cleveland and talked to a lot of officials and others about the situation. His broadcast exonerated Governor Bricker from blame, hung a little blame on Mayor Harold H. Burton, but tossed most of the responsibility back on the federal government, which had cut relief appropriations 62 per cent in Cleveland as against an average of 39 per cent for the whole country.

Graf Spee's Battle Showing Bolsters Views of Experts

Much has been said in the last few weeks as to the fact that the British navy has only three ships capable of catching and sinking a German pocket battleship, and that the United States navy does not have one.

This government started to build two battle cruisers, but they were changed into airplane carriers—the Saratoga and the Lexington—long before they were completed.

The answer to that is interesting, if not convincing to all naval experts. But our admirals have long been great believers in armor. In fact, their belief in armor is the essence of their stubborn insistence, during the attacks of Gen. William Mitchell and others, that the battleship was the heart and soul of sea power.

When Billy Mitchell was insisting that he could sink any battleship afloat by bombing from aircraft, the admirals merely sniffed. Their argument was that a battleship might be torpedoed and bombed from the air, and even hit by other battleships, but it would still remain afloat, and be able to inflict punishment until every other type of craft in the battle had been destroyed.

They Studied Records of World War Naval Battles

The admirals never made a very good case, so far as the public was concerned. For example, they never mentioned specific instances, which they very well could have done. But they studied the records of the World War sea battles. They knew that British battle cruisers were sunk at Dogger Bank when hit by salvos—that they went down so quickly that in one instance a ship following behind the cruisers could not change her course quickly enough to avoid sailing directly over where the cruiser had been! But the following ship did not scrape anything. The cruiser had gone to the bottom.

Our naval experts regard the German pocket battleships as just as vulnerable. Their opinion, before the battle near Montevideo, was that while the pocket battleships could give it, they could not take it.

"If two hostile pocket battleships should meet," one of them said, "the battle would be decided by the first salvo that landed. It would utterly destroy the vessel hit. By the same token, any of our regular battleships could stand off an attack by several of these pocket battleships. The battleship could take quite a few of their 11-inch salvos. Every time the battleship landed one salvo there would be one less pocket battleship."

A layman is entitled to wonder about this, especially as he remembers how the Admiral Graf Spee failed to sink any one of the three little cruisers which so nearly ruined her.

But on the other hand the punishment the Graf Spee took from such smaller ships seems to prove a point also for the conviction of our admirals that a fighting ship, as distinguished from a scouting or commerce raiding war vessel, must be heavily armored.

Documents in Evidence

By JANE SNOW

(Associated Newspapers—WNU Service.)

"I TRUSTED you, only to find that you had frittered yourself away on other women—I, who had saved my lips for my husband and had lived like a nun—"

Althea was going good, Don Morgan reflected.

"Bad daddy! Make mudder kwy!" Donny puffed out his chest and stamped his small feet.

Althea reached out, drew the indignant little figure to her and said, between sobs:

"Darling son! He'll take care of mother, won't he?"

"Of course, Althea," Don's voice carried a bored note, which gave her an inward wince, "such scenes always mean that you want something. This time, I suppose, it is the new roadster, which I told you I cannot afford. You will probably win, because I'd go bankrupt to escape this sort of melodrama, though you have found it lucrative. But you might at least keep the baby out of it."

In his youth Don Morgan had been too good looking and too susceptible. First he had succumbed to the appeal of Myrna Lewis, he being a handsome and romantic 18 and she a mysterious, alluring 32, who needed a satellite pending a divorce she was seeking.

No harm had been done for, Myrna had other plans, and after receiving Don's attentions for several months sailed away to a titled marriage.

Later on he became engaged to peppery Sally Will. But many of the other fellows had done the same thing. That affair ended, as most of hers did, with about her third tantrum.

When Althea came upon the scene Mabel Parsons had him almost landed—her stronghold was the serious, big-sister pose. But after he laid eyes on Althea there were no more affairs for Don, nor for Althea, either.

They were happy, except that Mabel Parsons took her spite out by telling Althea about Don's affairs in an increasing ratio. Althea took her spite by referring to these exaggerations when she wanted to manage Don.

This last scene, with three-year-old Donny taking part, was too much, Don told himself many times during the five or more miles he walked before he came back to his own door.

The next morning Don left before Donny and Althea were awake. He did not phone during the day and at night turned homeward with lagging steps, for he knew the hostilities would not end until the roadster question was settled. Dropping into a porch chair under the vine, he opened his paper.

"Whoo-oo-oo!" It was the whistle that went with the postman's outfit he had bought Donny the day before.

"Whoo-oo-oo! Mail, daddy!"

"A-a-all right, sir! How many letters today?"

"Four, free, leben!" The man held out his hand for them abstractedly. "Gotta hurry! Big hurry! Lotta letters, all down sweet!"

After a few minutes Don glanced at the letters. The first one was without an envelope and began, "Althea, My Own Angel."

A half-hour later Althea looked up from her reading, an injured aloofness in her manner, to see a husband whose mien was neither placating nor contrite, but rather that of a stern judge.

"You told me last night, Althea, between sobs, that you had saved your lips for your husband. Yet, before you knew me there was one Mike Wickham who said that your kiss was like wine to him!"

"Don, are you crazy!" she cried wildly. The stern judge went on.

"There was a poet, one Leon, who insisted that with his arms around you and his lips on yours the sorrows of the world were blotted out. He believed that you were going to marry him. And there was a Bobby James who went into a football game with your glove beneath his sweater; next to his heart, and with your kiss upon his brow. He called it life's accolade; so his team must have won."

"Are you trying to lie about my character?" bluffed Althea; angrily. He held up the mail Donny had given him and announced sternly:

"Althea, you have taunted me with my early foolishness for the last time. Also, there will be no more of the 'virgin mind,' 'innocent girl' or 'living like a nun' stuff. So far as your past and mine are concerned we will call it a draw!"

"You have been spying upon me!" She snatched at the letters. Donny, perspiring but happy, burst into the room, an empty mail-pouch over his shoulder.

"Well, mudder," he beamed, "I was postman, and I'd lvered all de letters out of dat big box back in your closet—'vybody got one. Didn't you like yours, daddy?"

"Mine were just what I needed, son," replied Don, zestfully, while Althea sobbed into her best satin cushion.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONFESSION OF FAITH

LESSON TEXT—Matthew 16:13-24.
GOLDEN TEXT—Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.—Matthew 16:16.

Many outstanding miracles had been performed by our Lord during His ministry in Galilee, and now as that period of His earthly work was drawing to a close He went with the disciples north into the great heathen center, Caesarea Philippi. Here He asked them life's greatest question, "What think ye of the Christ?" and Peter, blessed of God with true utterance, became the instrument for that confession of Christ upon which He could found His Church. Then there came from His blessed lips the prophecy of His death and resurrection which would make it possible for all who believe to become the sons of God and members of that Church.

I. The Question—Who is the Son of Man? (vv. 13-17).

The question of Christ was general at first, and in the answer we find that the people of our Lord's own day had a very high opinion of Him. They saw in Him the combined merits of the outstanding characters of their generation. They knew that He was no ordinary individual. He had made a striking impression on His own age, as indeed He has on every age of human history.

Observe carefully that such a confession of Christ is not sufficient. It is not enough to acknowledge Him as the great teacher, the perfect example, or the way-shower. To deny His divinity, to take from Him His place as Son of the living God is to make of Him an impostor and a fraud.

The personal question which follows, "Whom say ye that I am?" is the supremely important question from which no man can escape. Neutrality is impossible. Whatever we do or fail to do declares our position. "What think ye of Christ?" is the touchstone which determines character, condition and destiny.

Peter by the grace of God had come to the place where he recognized the one with whom he was having blessed fellowship in service as the Messiah, the Anointed One, the Son of the living God. We too should be so responsive to the guidance and control of the Holy Spirit that He may be able to teach us spiritual truth, which flesh and blood can never reveal.

II. The Church—Its True Foundation (vv. 18-20).

Christ, the Son of the living God, is the rock upon which the Church is built. The confession by Peter of this fact is in response to the question of Christ, "Whom say ye that I am?" and hence clearly relates to Christ, not to Peter, or to anything in Peter's personality. He was indeed blessed in his confession of Christ, but it is Christ who is the rock upon which the powerful and glorious Church is founded.

It follows without possibility of denial that only that organization which truly represents Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, has any right to call itself a church. Countless are the groups calling themselves churches which are nothing but social or intellectual clubs with possibly a slightly religious flavor, for they deny the deity of Christ. Why are they not honest enough to take their proper names and their rightful places in the community? Is it because they wish to have the financial support of God's people and bear the good name of the Church?

III. The Cross—for Christ and for Me (vv. 21-24).

The shadow of the cross falls across the little gathering of disciples as the Lord tells them of His impending death on the cross. Note that He rightly coupled with the fact of His death the truth of the resurrection, which gives it true meaning and which carries us beyond the darkness of Calvary to the light and beauty of Easter morning.

Peter who had a moment before spoken for God, now becomes the mouthpiece of the devil. From confessing His Lord, Peter turned to tempting Him to avoid the cross. That he "meant well" does not excuse Peter's folly, nor does it excuse the blundering though well-meaning misdirections which many are giving to the souls of men in our day. Had Jesus yielded to the solicitation of the Evil One through Peter, there would never have been any redemption from sin wrought out on Calvary's cross.

But we observe in verse 24 that there is a cross for the Christian as well as for Christ. Obviously we can never bear His cross, He alone could do that, but we are to take up our own cross and deny ourselves and follow Him. Self on the cross—Christ on the throne—such is the secret of real discipleship.

That Nagging Backache

May Warn of Disordered
Kidney Action

Modern life with its hurry and worry, irregular habits, improper eating and drinking—its risk of exposure and infection—throws heavy strain on the work of the kidneys. They are apt to become over-taxed and fail to filter excess acid and other impurities from the life-giving blood.

You may suffer nagging backache, headache, dizziness, getting up nights, leg pains, swelling—feel constantly tired, nervous, all worn out. Other signs of kidney or bladder disorder are sometimes burning, scanty or too frequent urination.

Try Doan's Pills. Doan's help the kidneys to pass off harmful excess body waste. They have had more than half a century of public approval. Are recommended by grateful users everywhere. Ask your neighbor!

IN MEMORIAM
In loving memory of our dear son and brother, Howard, who passed away January 2, 1937. Days of sadness still come over us. Tears in silence often flow. For memory keeps him ever near us. Tho he died three years ago. Although death amongst us came, Bitter pain to impart, It took a loved one from our home, But never from our heart.

PING PONG TOURNAMENT TO BEGIN JANUARY 3rd
With several weeks of preparatory practice, the League Ping Pong tournament of the Tinley Park Methodist church is now open in full swing.

Participants ranging from 12 to 20 years inclusive must register no later than January 17th. Registration blanks may be secured at the Drug Store or village hall.

This tournament will be conducted by the Round Robin method. By this we mean each player will be required to play each participant registered.

All players will be expected to furnish own paddle and balls and pay a fee of 15 cents to cover entire tournament.

On Wednesday evenings promptly at 7 p. m., the games will start in the Village Hall.

The fee will help defray the expense of a first and second trophy which will be presented at the end of the tournament. We are not trying to make money, only good sportsmanship and good fellowship.

IN MEMORIAM

ENDERS, Lydia — In sad and loving memory of our beloved wife and mother who passed away December 30, 1929.

We have lost our darling wife and mother.

She has bid us all adieu;
She has gone to live in heaven,
And her form is lost from view.
Oh, that dear one, how we loved her,
Oh, how hard it was to give her up,
But an angel came down for her,
And removed her from our flock.

LOVING HUSBAND AND CHILDREN.

MUNCH, HENRY G. — In fond and loving memory of our dear husband and daddy who left us so sudden four years ago, December 30, 1935.

Shrine Winter Circus With 64 All Star Acts Opens Sat.

Assembled from all over the world an all-star program of 64 acts will be presented at the third annual Shrine Winter Circus which opens Saturday evening, December 30 and continues through January 14 at the International Amphitheater, 42nd and Halsted streets, Chicago.

War infested Europe has contributed a number of topliners who will augment the stars of the largest American outdoor tent shows to round out a bill the like of which has never been offered in a sawdust arena in Chicago.

Sponsored by Medinah Temple, the net proceeds of the circus will go to the Shriners' Hospital for Crippled Children, located at 2211 North Oak Park avenue. The hospital admits only crippled children, regardless of demonation or race, whose parents or guardians are too poor to pay for surgical and medical treatment.

Joseph G. Rowley, illustrious Potentate of the sponsoring organization, announces a heavy advance sale of seats and anticipates that last year's attendance record of 250,000 will be materially increased.

Headlining the circus are such outstanding stars as Captain Ramon Proske, wild animal trainer, and his cage of Bengal tigers; the Great Wallendas, who perform perilous balancing stunts including pyramids on bicycles on a high wire; the Flying Solts, who do two and a half somersaults from a flying trapeze and also present their brilliantly colorful aerial ballet of fifty beautiful girls, and the Loyal Repensky's, in daring bare-back riding feats.

Other headliners include the Flying Harolds, the aerial Voises, Rudy Rudynoff and his "educated" Liberty horses, the noted Davenport-Hodgini equestrian troupe; the famous Picchiana acrobatic troupe of Europeans; the Wen Hai troupe in a Chinese novelty act; the Six Antaleks in thrilling perch feats, the Jung trio, the Six Abdahualhs and the Rieffenbachs, direct from Enrope; Don Francisco, the Karolis, the La Pearl Trio, Naida and Perez, the Lary Sisters, the Doro Duo, the Lopal Troupe of acrobats and Diane Lovett, the beautiful elephant trainer.

Miss Lovett will put a troupe of 15 performing elephants through their paces. Roland Hibler and his trained seals, the Lary and Cutshall sisters are other notable acts on the bill.

Otto Griebing, internationally noted clown, will head a congress of sixty fun-makers including the inimitable "Shorty" Flemm. Animal actors will include dogs, ponies and monkeys.

Lee Powell, the original talking picture "Lone Ranger," with his wonder horse and his own company of rip-roaring buckaroos, will appear in person and perform many thrilling stunts that have made him famous in the movies as America's No. 1 cowboy star.

Captain Ramon Proske, one of the highest paid circus performers of the present day, will demonstrate his ability to dominate a cageful of snarling Bengal tigers. Proske knows no fear in his absolute command of the jungle beasts. He personally has trained every animal in his collection.

The executive committee in charge of the circus is composed of Norman J. Kissick, chairman; Arthur M. Gullickson and John B. Morgan, Orrin Davenport, veteran circus executive, is production manager.

Reserved seats are on sale at the Amphitheater, Medinah Temple, 14 East Ohio Street and the Hotel Sherman.

Following the opening Saturday evening, there will be performances twice daily at 2 and 8 p. m. Reservations are now being received for New Year's Eve.

Corn Allotment Figures Given At Meeting

A corn acreage allotment of 115,383 acres has been set for Will county under the 1940 AAA program, it is announced by Byron Gaskill, chairman of the county AAA committee. This allotment and other figures bearing on the 1940 agricultural conservation program in the county have just been released from Lee M. Gentry, chairman of the state AAA committee.

The total allotment for the county of all soil-depleting crops is 242,354 acres.

The 1940 corn acreage allotment for the state of Illinois has been announced as 6,513,876 acres, compared with 7,308,282 acres last year.

The Will county corn allotment compares with an allotment of 125,577 acres last year, and the total soil-depleting allotment compares with a 257,606 acre allotment last year.

Assisted by community committeemen, members of the county committee are now determining individual farm acreage allotments, which will be mailed to farmers about January 10, 1940. This will allow ample time for farmers to plan their 1940 cropping practices in line with provisions of the farm program.

Mr. Gaskill pointed out that, because of variation in local conditions the reductions in all individual farm allotments will not necessarily be the same.

Principal factors in the reduced allotment are the abundant supply of corn in the nation's ever-normal granary and the greatly increased corn yields of recent years, resulting from improved cultural methods including use of hybrid seed corn and better machinery and the retirement of the poorer land to soil-conserving crops under the AAA program.

Trade Agreement Defended by Hull

Among the chief speakers heard during the meeting were Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who defended the reciprocal trade agreements program; Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, who came out for an income certificate plan for wheat, cotton, tobacco, and rice which would in effect finance parity payments for those crops; and Raymond Leslie Buell, of Fortune magazine, who gave perhaps the most remarkable address of the convention. Buell defended the Hull trade agreements program more effectively than did Secretary Hull himself, and showed the necessity for a competitive economy with fewer restrictions, more production and greater abundance if we are to have any national prosperity.

John Nance Garner of Texas Lauded in New Campaign Song

DALLAS—A swinging melody and catchy words—in a new song about John Nance Garner, Vice President, has just been published under the title: "Cactus Jack," by the songwriting combination of Rex Lampman and Jack Foy.

Amateur song-writers have deluged the Dallas headquarters of the Garner-for-President campaign with new verses, of their own writing. The song has eight verses, but only four are printed herewith, as follows:

I
In Texas down by the Rio Grande
There's plenty of work for a good cowhand,
There's milk and honey and hot tamales
And the sweetest bunch of "O by gollyes."
The sky is wide and high and blue
And you say to strangers "how de do."
There's room to breathe or to bet a stack,
There's the blue bonnet girls and there's Cactus Jack.

Chorus:
Cactus Jack, he's a-riding straight,
Riding straight for the White House gate.
Don't look away, don't look away,
You can't look away from Texas.

II
We'll tell you this about Cactus Jack:
He's quick on the trigger or a wisecrack,
Just as wise as an old horned toad—
There ain't very much he's never known!
He can hogtie a yearling quick as you wish,

III
If the river ain't dry he'll catch you a fish;
Cactus Jack with his old seegar,
He'll look right nice in that White House car!

IV
We'll tell you this about Cactus Jack:
He's hit the trail and he won't turn back;
He's riding high and he's riding straight,
And he's headed for the White House gate!
From Amarillo to San Antonio
They'll tell you Jack has never been thrown;
Hi, yippee! Cactus Jack!
He'll hang his hat on the White House rack.

CHAPTER X—Continued

Before Autumn was aware that there had come any change in the immobility of his posture, Bruce had seized her wrist and turned her about so that she stood facing him.

"I should like you to know, just the same," he said.

As he spoke, he drew her violently to him. For an electrifying instant, she knew that all her resistance had crumpled within her and that she was responding to his almost brutal kiss with a fierce and overwhelming joy. Then, with all the strength of her arms, she beat against him, striving to tear herself away from his crushing embrace.

With a low laugh, Bruce grasped her shoulders and flung her from him, so that she reeled backward against the wall of the cabin. She stood, gasping in rage and terror, unable to speak, while he lit another cigarette and lounged indifferently again on the table's edge.

"Now—you have the reason," he said. "You had better not come here again."

She looked across at him, unable at first to give place to the terrifying conviction that had come suddenly upon her. She had done more than cure him of his love for her—she had destroyed even his respect for her.

In a moment she was out of the door into the blindness of a dying sky, a dying world, into a forlorn space that was hollow with the moan of death.

CHAPTER XI

Autumn had gone to the drawing room immediately after dinner and had seated herself at the piano. During the hour she had sat at the table with her father, she had done her best to bring him out of his solitary brooding. But her own frame of mind had been too desolate to make the task easy. She was sorry for him, inexpressibly so.

For weeks Autumn had watched him fighting alone, retreating before the heartless bludgeonings of his own conscience, recovering himself again and beating his way back to a position of self-respect and renewed faith in himself. And always Autumn knew that his love for her was the one precious thing in his life. It was because of her, the daughter of Millicent, that he refused to give up the fight, and because of the memory of Millicent that lived in her.

It was only natural, perhaps, that he should be blind to the fact that by his stubborn struggle he was drawing his daughter into the conflict. He had thought to avoid that by keeping her where she would never have known of it. Had she been content to remain in England, Jarvis would have fought through to the end and died in the comforting knowledge that she could at least begin her own life and live it as she pleased, without the unhappy heritage of the past.

And now another evening was coming serenely to a close, as though the stars of the night before, when she had gone alone to see Bruce, had not shrunk out of the sky, as though all beauty had not become ashes in her heart. Jarvis had gone to his library after dinner, and Autumn sat at the piano, her hands lipping idly over the keys, her eyes inattentively noting the blue dusk that stole from the open window and made a strange, impalpable color of a great bowl of yellow roses.

Presently her hands fell from the keyboard and lay listlessly in her lap. At a sound from the hall, she turned and saw her father standing in the doorway, his cigar in his fingers, his eyes fixed upon her with an unwonted tenderness.

"What was that you were playing, Autumn?" he asked after a moment.

"That was Grondahl's 'Serenade,' Da," she told him.

"I've heard you play it before—and I've asked the name of it," he said, "but I can never seem to remember. Play it again. I like it."

He came into the room and went to a large chair that stood to one side of the French windows where he sat gazing out into the fitful light of the garden as Autumn played. When she came to the end at last, he did not speak, and Autumn got up and moved to the console where the roses stood. She caressed an opulent, full-blown, yellow bloom with thoughtful fingers.

"No more music?" Jarvis enquired at last, a wistful note in his voice that hurt the bruised part of her being.

"Perhaps—later," she said quietly.

"Aye," he said, "I suppose one must be in the mood for it. But that bit, now—the one you just played—means something. It brings a light to one when he hears it."

Old Saint Pat ambled into the room and settled himself on a rug at his master's feet. Autumn left the roses and walked to a chair near her father's.

"Da," she said gently, "what would you say to my going back to Aunt Flo?"

The Laird turned slowly in his chair and looked at her across his shoulder. She glanced at him insouciantly, almost without interest in how he should respond to her question. She had really not meant it for a question so much as an announcement.

But the helpless, almost childlike look of dejection that appeared promptly in his eyes gave her a moment's disquietude.

He bent forward and clasped his hands. "You wish to go, Autumn?" he asked, his voice grown wistful.

"Da," she replied, "one can't always do just what one would like to do. I came here because I wanted to—and I've managed to make a mess of everything since I've come."

Jarvis sighed heavily. "I'm sorry, my dear. It hasn't been your fault, either."

"It's the full of no one in particular," Autumn said. "It was just in the cards."

"Aye. I know. You're still thinking of Geoffrey's son. Isn't that it?"

"I'm thinking—of everything," she responded. "I can't go on living here—with things as they are. I've done my best, Da—or my worst, perhaps, you would say. It will be easier for everyone concerned if I get back to the other side of the world."

She got up again and went to stand before the window. There followed a long silence burdened with the impasse to which their emotions had come. She heard her father clear his throat with a deep rumble, and then she knew that he had risen and was coming slowly toward her.

His hand lay for a moment gently upon her shoulder, but she did not turn to look at him.

"I'm sorry, my girl," he muttered. "I cannot tell you how sorry I am. I had hoped—somehow—that you might be happy here—after a time—in spite of everything. I had hoped for too much, it seems."

"I had, too," Autumn replied. "But it wasn't to be."

"I shall miss you more now than ever," Jarvis said, and then, after a long silence: "But you must not stay because of that, Autumn."

"You are making it easy for me to go," Autumn said, somewhat abruptly in spite of herself.

The old man went back to his chair. "Autumn," he said at last, "don't be impatient with me tonight. I'm tired—and your music—"

"I didn't mean that, Da," she said quickly and went to him at once.

The Laird's head sank forward, his eyes staring out upon the garden. "I'd be just as glad if I could make it easy for you to stay," he said. "Sometimes I think you—"

His voice stopped and he swept his eyes with his hand. Autumn threw her arms around him and pressed him close to her in silence. Presently he freed himself gently from her embrace.

"You think of your father as a coward, Autumn," he said stoutly, "I may have more courage than you know. Yesterday—when the boy came to see me—I thought I might tell him—tell him all that I told you one night upstairs there. I have my senses still, and I can see things still—with my own eyes. All your silly carrying-on this summer with that mad crowd of Elliot Parr's—it didn't blind me to the truth. I've known from the first what was behind it. I've spent days and nights thinking about it. And when the boy came—before he came to me, I thought—I thought—the right thing to do would be to tell him—so that he'd know—so that he'd understand. Then, I thought—he could do what he liked—and you could do what you liked—and I wouldn't raise a hand to stop it, one way or the other. But—there's no way of accounting for these things, it seems. He came to me—and he stood there as if he had been Geoffrey Lander himself—proud, insolent, careless—and I offered him money for the loss of his sheep. I don't think I expected him to take it—but his manner stirred something in me. It stirred the bitterness and the hatred and the pride that have filled me for twenty years—and I turned him out!" He paused for a moment. "And now—I am turning you out, it seems."

"No, Da," Autumn protested, "it isn't so. You mustn't say that. I am going back—as I told you—because I think it will be best for us all."

Jarvis Dean drew himself up. "Have him over—tonight—in the morning," he said. "Bring him here—and I'll tell him. I'll tell him all I told you. When he has heard—"

"Father, please!" Autumn pleaded. "That would only hurt him—and it would only hurt me. You would be doing that for me, and it would be quite useless. If I love Bruce Lander, it's only another of my silly blunders. I'll get over it—with the ocean between us it ought to be easy. I'm not so hopeless that I shall go on forever breaking my heart over someone who doesn't care for me."

The Laird raised his head and looked at her. "You mean—he—" "I mean—he doesn't love me, Da," she said, smiling down at him, "though there's nothing so strange about that."

Jarvis was thoughtful for a moment. Then he got up quickly and stood looking at his half-smoked cigar. "I didn't think he'd be such a damned young fool!" he said.

Autumn laughed suddenly, but

Laird looked at her sternly. "It'll be as you say, then," he said. "It's better so. I'll sell up in the fall and join you."

He patted her shoulder in awkward and inarticulate compassion, and turned away. She could hear his retreating steps on the polished floor, heavy and measured and pondering. To her defeated spirit, it seemed that those footsteps sounded the inexorable, iron stride of the past crushing down the present and the future.

She looked out upon the blurred garden with eyes dull in resignation.

During the days that followed, Jarvis Dean's spirits were lighter than they had been for months. To be sure, it was not pleasant to think that Autumn was leaving the place to which she had come such a short time ago, her heart swelling with anticipation of what the future held for her, her mind full of plans for the new life she was entering. He was sorry for her. And yet, the irking uncertainty of those weeks had been almost more than he could bear at times. Autumn's decision to return to the Old Country had relieved him of that, at least. His own resolve to sell everything and follow her as soon as it could be managed without too great a sacrifice had brought its regrets, its pang of loneliness, but that had passed. He had a clear road before him now. He would leave behind him the past and all its burden of unhappiness and spend the rest of his days in a manner befitting a man of ample means whose declining years might easily be his brightest.

It was some such feeling that possessed him as he looked at Autumn now, sitting opposite him at the breakfast table. He had ordered an early breakfast so that he might leave in good time on his journey into the hills to inspect his flocks and to take up some supplies to old Absalom Peek. Tom Willmar had been making the trips back and forth during the summer, but Jarvis was in the habit of going himself at least once during the season. Besides, he had given instructions to have the young Irish lad, Clancy Shane, drive out the few hundred sheep that had been culled from the range and were being brought down to be sold. He wanted to spend a half hour with the boy and assure himself that everything was coming along as it should.

"You might make the trip in with me today, Autumn," he suggested, "if you have nothing else to do. It would be company for me and the drive would do you no harm."

"I thought of it last night," Autumn said. "It will be my last chance to see the flocks before I leave."

"Aye—that's so. Well, get yourself ready and I'll wait for you."

"I'll change in a jiffy, Da," she said, and left the table.

"Put enough lunch in the box for the two of us, then," Jarvis told Hannah. "We'll be back for dinner late."

They were on the road before the day was more than a bright flame on the eastern hilltops and Autumn was guiding the car over the smooth trail at a speed that made her father grip the edges of the seat with both hands.

"The trail will be rougher higher up, Da," she explained once when she glanced sideways at him and saw the grim set of his face. "We'll make good time now and loaf later on."

Noon brought them within sight of the small flock that Clancy Shane was bringing down from the upper ranges and Autumn waited in the car while her father walked down into the valley. Half an hour later he came back.

"I think I'll stay along with Moony," he said. "If you want to go along by yourself and have a word with Absalom, you can pick me up on the way back."

"I'll do that, Da," she said. "Have you any message for Absalom?" "Just give him the box of stuff there in the back of the car and tell him I'll be up myself maybe in a week or two."

Autumn started the motor and put her hand on the gear shift.

"Here, now—wait a bit!" Jarvis shouted. "We'll eat first."

For a full hour, Autumn and her father talked and laughed together as they had not done since she was a child. When she got up to go at last, Jarvis went with her to the car and leaned over to kiss her before she started away.

"So long, darling," Autumn called as she put the car into the trail again. "I'll be back before you know it."

Jarvis stood shading his eyes against the mid-day sun, until the car vanished around a bend in the trail, and an inexplicable sadness came over him. He had been too happy for the past hour. He turned and picked his way slowly down into the valley.

It was not until Autumn's visit with Absalom Peek had come to an end and she was preparing to hurry away that she found the courage to tell him that she was bidding him good-bye for the last time. She had stayed with the old herder much longer than she had planned.

"You'll be comin' up again, like as not," Absalom said as they strolled together toward Autumn's car.

"I'm afraid not, Absalom," she told him. "I'm never coming again."

"Eh?" The old man looked at her in surprise.

"I'm going back again—to England, Absalom."

"Now, now! What's wrong, eh?"

"There's nothing wrong, Absalom. I'm just—out of place here."

Absalom thrust his fingers under his weathered hat and scratched his head.

"Well, well," he said at last. "It isn't much of a place for a young girl, I know. It'll go hard with the Laird, I'm thinkin', losin' you again just when he's got used to havin' you round."

Autumn hesitated before she made her reply. After all, it would do no good to tell him that her father had decided to spend the rest of his days abroad.

"I haven't been much of a help to him, I'm afraid," she replied.

"He's past help, that man," Absalom said suddenly. "Not but what he's been a great man in his day. But he's not livin', Miss Autumn."

"Poor Da," Autumn murmured. "He hasn't had an easy life."

"That's right enough. He hasn't. But he won't make it easier by packin' you off to that—"

"He's not sending me away, Absalom," she hastened to assure him.

"I'm going because I want to."

Absalom regarded her quizzically. "There's more behind it than that, I'm thinkin'. Though I'm askin' no questions, mind."

She was staunchly cheerful in her farewell to Absalom, but a hot mist came between her eyes and that unforgettable picture there on the hillside below them. And then, in a moment, she was gone and old Absalom had turned again to his solitary task.

Very late that night, when Autumn lay awake and allowed her mind to drift sleepily back over the journey into the hills, it seemed to her that what she had beheld in the cycle of that day had been sunrise and sunset on the moon, or on some bizarrely landscaped planet hitherto only a fantastic dream in the mind of man. Early morning had clawed great, long scars of black valley down the pale, colossal faces of the hills, frightening and thrilling in their report of what this land had been in ages gone. Noon had made insubstantial islands of the mountain tops, swimming in their mists as on the white lambency of some primordial sea. And in the twilight, the dark patches of pine that marked the valleys in that broad expanse might have been the spoor of creatures unthinkable, in an unthinkable chaos of the earth.

No more of that now! Back again to the artificial, the purposeless life she had known with Aunt Flo. Forget that there had ever been anything else. Forget the reverent somber brow of a mountain bared to the moon. Forget a star unfolding like a bloom of sweet loneliness in the luminous, unnameable color of a summer sky. Forget the drift of mountain rain in the spring, and the fiery torches of Indian paint brush on the gaunt hills. Forget Bruce Lander, and the curious, heartless, dear ways of love, forever.

CHAPTER XII

On an evening within a week of the time set for Autumn's departure, Florian Parr telephoned from Hector Cardigan's place and invited her to go with him to the Hospital Benefit Ball that night in Kamloops.

"Linda is here with me," Florian said. "I had to come up on business, but I see no reason why we shouldn't mix in a little pleasure with it. We brought our duds and we're all dolled up. We haven't seen anything of you for two weeks. I'll run out in the car for you if you say so. How about it?"

"I don't know, Florian," she temporized. "I'm not much in the mood for it."

"Oh, come on!" he urged her. "Where's your community spirit? The natives will never forgive you if you don't support the cause. Hector has promised to chaperon us."

Florian laughed in a meaningful naivete which nettled her disproportionately.

"Even you think I ought to have someone to look after me," she replied.

HOW TO SEW

by Ruth Wyeth Spears

A washable pony.

THIS pony may be made of oil cloth or other waterproof fabric. It is stuffed with cotton or bits of soft cloth, and is a fascinating toy for a gift or to sell at bazaars.

Rule paper into 1-inch squares; number them; then draw pattern outlines, as shown. The pattern for the body is shown at A; the mane at B; tail C; ears D. The strip E joins the two sides of the body. The openings are for mane and tail. The projections show where ears are sewed. Cut two pieces for each ear, and the tail; sew together, padding slightly.

Strip F is for bottoms of feet; and under part of body and legs.

The raw edges are sewn together on the right side as at the lower right, with heavy thread to match tail and mane.

NOTE: Mrs. Spears' 32-page Sewing Book No. 4, contains directions for making dolls; gift items for all ages; and novelties that have sold unusually well at bazaars. She will mail copy upon receipt of name, address and 10 cents in coin.

Write Mrs. Spears, Drawer 10, Bedford Hills, New York.

AROUND the HOUSE

Items of Interest to the Housewife

Touch of Garlic.—Rub the broiling lightly with a clove of garlic before broiling a steak.

To clean rubber sponges, put half an ounce of bicarbonate of soda in half a pint of water and soak them all night in this solution.

An excellent cleaning "weapon" for kitchen utensils is found in a good-sized bottle cork. Moisten the bottom end, dip it in a powdered cleaner and rub the utensils.

Do not waste cake or bread by cutting off a burned crust. This can be removed by a flat grater, and it will leave a smooth surface, instead of a jagged crust.

When using soap dyes that come in cake form, put cake into soap shaker and shake until dye is right color. It will not then be necessary to strain dye.

Prunes for Puddings.—Prunes lend themselves to almost any form of bread pudding. For this purpose it is well to soak them until the stones can be taken out easily, and then chop them.

When you're frosting cakes be sure to have them free from any loose crumbs. In smoothing the icing, use a spatula which is frequently dipped in warm water.

For Dessert.—When you have a saucer of apple sauce and don't know what to have for dessert, make a one-egg layer cake, dust the lower layer with powdered sugar and spread with the apple sauce (and this is improved if a bit of candied orange, lemon or grapefruit peel has been cooked with it). Cover with the other layer and dust powdered sugar over the top.

Salted meat requires longer boiling than fresh. Put it into cold water, quickly bring it to a boil, then let it simmer.

To clean a griddle that has become crusted, put over a very hot fire and cover thickly with salt. After the salt has burned brown, the crust and salt will brush off together, leaving the griddle like new. After washing the griddle, grease well and heat before putting away.

Choosing a Career.—We should all choose the brave career in which we can do most and best for mankind.—Stevenson.

Safety in Speed.—In skating over thin ice our safety is in our speed.—Emerson.
